It is believed that all of the horses were drowned. Some of them were seen swimming after the Columbia sank, but it is not believed any were saved. All but one belonged to the Mallory Steamship line and were being brought over for the day's trucking. The other horse belongs to a truckman named Johanns, at No. 21 Columbia street, Manhattan.

The Columbia cost $76,000 when she was built thirty years ago. She was about the oldest of the Union Ferry Company's fleet. She will be raised to-morrow by the Merritt-Chapman Wrecking Company.

The City of Lowell was damaged but little by the collision. Some of the timbers on her port side were smashed and the stem head was broken and chipped. A few feet of sail was also carried away.

William Lester, of No. 168 Prince street, Brooklyn, and "Buck" Jones, colored, of No. 237 Navy street, passengers on the Columbia, were injured.
